“ I met Umesh Nayak when I was a small child. He worked closely with my father. He came to get-togethers at my house, and unlike most of the guests, he always took time to get down on the floor to talk to me although I was very little. He gave me a book called "Indian Fables," in which I signed my name (misspelled) in blue crayon. The book was published in the year of my birth, so I was surely quite young. I forced my father to read stories to me from that book all throughout my early childhood. Umesh also brought me a small wooden elephant from India that I keep on my dresser. My father died years ago, and I came upon the Indian Fables book recently again, and thought of Umesh. I looked online and found this. I would be very happy to meet his family (children or wife if she is surviving). I cannot see any information here. Please let me know if you see this. I am sorry for your loss although now four years have passed. My father is gone also (2010). Good-bye, Umesh.
